

Good evening.

A show of [redacted] at Nato's 70th anniversary gathering - embodied in the traditional end of meeting statement - has been [redacted] by footage of the Canadian Prime Minister, Justin Trudeau, in conversation with other leaders, apparently [redacted] Donald Trump.

The President responded in a press conference by calling Mr Trudeau "two-faced".

It came after [redacted] exchanges yesterday between the US leader and France's President, underlining tensions [redacted] Nato's future direction.

Our deputy political editor, John Pienaar, was at the meeting, and his [redacted] contains some [redacted] photography.

He loves to make a big entrance, [redacted] or not he's always completely welcome.

Donald Trump [redacted] not always be looking for trouble, but it often [redacted] out that way.

He needs [redacted] handling, and everyone knows it.

That includes his [redacted] who's fighting a campaign.

The honorable Donald Trump, President of the United States of America.

The leader of the [redacted] world had already fallen foul of Nato [redacted] and strayed into the election.

He's not a man to [redacted] directions.

When it came to the UK's most powerful ally, Boris Johnson was [redacted] very carefully today.

The president of the United States has [redacted] of his admiration for you.

Do you believe that, as a leader and as a man, that Donald Trump is good for the [redacted] and good for Britain and, if so, why?

Well, I certainly think, John, that the United States is the guarantor of...

A massive contributor to Nato and, you know, if you want evidence of the [redacted] of the United States to stand shoulder to shoulder with us, I would [redacted] to back to what happened in the case of the poisonings in Salisbury.

America stood shoulder to shoulder with us then, it has done for [redacted] and is an invaluable [redacted] and continues to be so.

What about Mr Trump himself, [redacted] Prime Minister?

You were saying... I... I... I...

Let's be clear, this was under the [redacted] US administration and they were shoulder to shoulder with us.

But here he's sharing a joke at Donald Trump's expense last night, [redacted]; Canada's leader's take on the US President's timekeeping.

Then he [redacted] the shock of White House [redacted] at Mr Trump's off-the-cuff diplomacy this week.

Britain's PM had heard it all, but he was [redacted] ignorance.

That's...that's...that's complete [redacted].

I don't know where that's come from.

But this was Donald Trump's [redacted] on the Canadian leader.

Well, he's two-faced.

"He's two-faced," he said, obviously not at all happy.

[redacted] and ceremony at the summit here in Hertfordshire, while in Nottingham Labour's leader [redacted] a world away.

Number ten!

Jeremy Corbyn's vision, a Nato dedicated to [redacted]

I thought the direction Nato was going was a [redacted] one, I've had discussions with many people, and I want to see a reduction in tensions around the world.

We cannot go on developing in the concept of an [redacted] race.

There has to be a process of recognising the real [redacted] in this world are [redacted] terrorism, cybersecurity, and, of course, the [redacted] crisis that affects all of us.

And I think we can all play a part in dealing with those [redacted]

The [redacted] leaders are offering very different visions of Britain's future.

From Labour's radical socialism to the Tories' Brexit with or without a deal, and an option to stop Brexit altogether on offer too.

The country's economic, political, [redacted]; future all up for grabs in an election which could come to shape or reshape the country, and the lives of [redacted] in it.

Summit over, Boris Johnson had walked into a diplomatic [redacted]

If there is a next time, he'll hope for [redacted]
